In August 2014, members of the MICU nursing team became the first nurses in New York City to care for a patient with a possible diagnosis of Ebola Virus Disease. Amy Albano, MBA, BSN, RN, Senior Director for Nursing Operations, Finance and Quality wrote: “Our MICU nurses displayed attributes of teamwork, competence, dedication, and awareness of both self and others. Any nurse assigned to care for this patient stepped forward. No one hesitated. Nurses came in to work extra shifts so that this patient could be a one-on-one nurse-to-patient assignment and all other MICU patients would continue to receive the critical care they required. Nurses were attentive to small matters that would assist in the patient’s comfort: iced coffees, new personal clothing, contact with family and friends via telephone or email. They never wavered in their commitment to all patients in their care, and they rejoiced when this patient was cleared of a life-threatening illness.” For these reasons, the MICU Nursing Team was awarded the New York Times “Tribute to Nurses” 2014 team award.
