

When Robert Levine, a United States Tennis Association National Champion, started experiencing spinal pain, he went to a local hospital. Unfortunately, Robert got no relief. Not good for the future of his tennis career. Lucky for him he received a second opinion from doctors at The Spine Hospital at Mount Sinai. They diagnosed Robert with an extremely rare injury called interspinous ligament avulsion. Minimally invasive spinal surgery was performed to remove the damaged ligament and bone. How did Mount Sinai do in their match against the injury? Not only is Robert's back better, but he's playing tennis at the professional level.

212-241-8947
mountsinai.org/nyspine

WHEN

ANOTHER HOSPITAL GAVE TENNIS PLAYER

ROBERT LEVINE THE WRONG DIAGNOSIS,

MOUNT SINAI CRIED FAULT.

