New York was facing a healthcare crisis. Hospitals providing critical resources were beginning to close, putting entire communities at risk. Mount Sinai made a commitment to expand its network and build preventative programs and resources to ensure that these communities received the vital services they needed. The commitment grew to what is now the Mount Sinai Health System.

The care Mount Sinai provides not only is exemplary, it's accessible. Beyond the seven Mount Sinai hospitals, the system consists of more than 6,100 primary care and specialty physicians, over 45 ambulatory care practices, and 31 affiliated community health centers. In addition, we have more than 80 relationships with local physicians and group practices serving patients in some 300 community locations throughout the region.

Ironically, our number one mission is to keep people out of the hospital by keeping them healthy. We're moving away from traditional fee-for-service medicine toward population health management, with its emphasis on continuous and coordinated care. Of course, we will continue to be a leader in caring for patients with complex conditions and will remain the destination of choice for patients with acute illnesses requiring the most advanced procedures and inpatient care.

Taken together, it makes New York a safer place. And proves that to care for a city, it takes a system.
